Form 990, Part III, Line 3 - Ceased Conducting or Significant Changes To Services

HARC no longer does Trace Detection research on behalf of the Homeland Security;

HARC's TCEQ funded Air Quality Research Program terminated 12-29-2009.

Form 990, Part III, Line 4a - Program Service Accomplishments

HARC's Air Quality & Climate Program includes efforts in several areas: air quality research and management; air emissions technologies; urban heat island mitigation planning; scenario building for transportation and air quality; the links between air quality and human health; air quality and the built environment; and regional impacts and solutions related to climate change.

HARC is helping Texas improve the science behind its air quality policymaking through its role as Research Management Organization to the Texas Environmental Research Consortium. This initiative has become a nationally recognized process by which key economic, environmental, and political stakeholders in the greater Houston and Dallas regions work with the research community to better understand regional air science, speed the adoption of air emissions control technologies, and make informed policy decisions.

Form 990, Part III, Line 4b - Program Service Accomplishments

HARC's Land, Water, People Program emphasizes the interactions between ecological, hydrological and social processes, particularly as they relate to biodiversity, water quality and quantity, ecosystem informatics, economics, policy, and social and institutional analysis. The goal of the Program is to link ecosystems and water resources to sustainable development through improved understanding of the interactions between humans and these resources and to facilitate regulatory, institutional and technological change and improved decision making. Our approach is interdisciplinary, integrating ecological, physical and social sciences with information technology. HARC compiles and manages numerous databases describing environmental quality, biological and water resources, and aquatic and terrestrial habitats in its region. Information technology tools and geographic information systems allow HARC to translate the data into information through the development of environmental indicators, statistical results, spatial and temporal analysis and to analyze changes in ecosystem and water resources.

Non-market valuation techniques are used to provide economic representation of the ecosystem, and help decision-makers achieve more effective stewardship. Using a variety of qualitative and quantitative social science methods, HARC examines the social values people attach to natural resources and what they consider to be appropriate resource management approaches.

Form 990, Part III, Line 4c - Program Service Accomplishments

HARC's Clean Energy Program includes integrative and collaborative work in these areas: stationary fuel cells; combined heat and power generation; energy market tools and products; strategic energy planning; clean energy applications analysis; and clean energy policy analysis. HARC will focus on new sources of energy including hydrogen and biomass and the technological, regulatory, market and social barriers to their adoption.

The mission of the Clean Energy Program is to accelerate development and adoption of clean energy technologies, services, and policies that enhance regional sustainability. HARC bridges gaps between basic research in energy services and technologies and their commercial implementation by taking the lead in convening stakeholders and in crafting and executing research, verification, and validation.
